A few days since while Jesse Smith, of Wayne county, was cutting down a tree, it fell in a different direction than was expected, and his son, aged 10, who was such porter the other day, said:

"The contributions of State products are simply wonderful, especially in the matter of natural products. Kansas sends specimens of wheat, corn and cereals. Cologrado sends specimens of both mineral and agricultural productions. Minnesota her gwheat and oats, Michigan her copper, Ohio and West Virginia their coal, Pennsylvania her machinery and other States specimens of their leading natural and as specimens of their leading natural and as it fifted in the specimens of their leading natural and as specimens of their leading natural and as it fifted in the specimens of their leading natural and as specimens of their leading natural and as it fifted in the specimens of their leading natural and as specimens of their leading natural and as it fifted in the state of the most magnificent displays ever seen on this continent. The exhibit of West virginia coal attracted very general attention. Ex-Senator Henry G. Davis had one column of coal from his Piedmont mine fifteen feet thick. The Kanawha coal was also minutely examined. The wool exhibit of West Virginia took the premium over all shown. This wool came from Brooke and Hancock counties, almost at the door of Pitaburgh, and might almost be claimed by Pennsylvania in view of the species on scheme. This is doing pretty welf for a State that made no appropriation for an exhibition of its resources. What was done by both Pennsylvania and West Virginia was accomplished by moneys derived from other sources."
